

As a subscriber to Indiana's phone privacy list, I am very concerned to hear that there is the possibility a federal law might be enacted that would soften the restrictions of our state law.

We have enjoyed evening meals uninterrupted by the frequent 2-3 calls per night. They often interrupted my husband's rest before work.

As a clear state's right's issue, I see a federal law as both unnecessary and ill advised when it is clear that a state law has adequately handled the issue. I am never in favor of the federal government taking a role that can be handled by the state, especially when the federal law might be less effective (in this case more lax) hampering the state's ability to administer its own legislation.
